

From the 1970s onwards, houses were built outside the old village. The lack of housing available in the centre during this time, as well as new ideas of comfort, lay behind the developments on the outskirts.

Guy Masson and his family lived in the house he inherited from his parents in the heart of the village from 1980 to 1996. There was no parking space, view or land around the residence. So the family decided to build a new house on a plot of land outside the village. Despite enjoying living in a place he really liked, when he retired he wanted to move back into the house in the village. He preferred to be close to his neighbours and relatives, near to the local bar, and the fact that there was no land to look after, influenced his decision.